

sit, plotting my finishing line while listening to Samantha Fox and Cinderella. (I can't say much for the looks of the Cinderella boys, but Samantha is a definite 9.5+.)

I have nearly written myself to sleep, so I have to stop. If you have managed to read this entire thing, I commend you on a difficult mission completed; also, if you cared about anything I have said, I thank you. With that, I hereby declare this editorial complete, intact, finished, and any other suitable synonyms. (Quite a catchy last line, wouldn't you say?)

Broddy F. Berger

The reason why I like Play Day is because we don't have to do any school work. But it is like a regular day of school. All we do is just watch the little kids run for ribbons. Some of the students don't have to help with the events. They just wash cars or clean them out.

Jimmy Blazewick

As Jamie wrote about the pop being banned, I am going to write about candy bars being banned during classes. I think that we should be able to eat candy bars during school. The teachers get to eat during school classes so I think that if we don't get to eat during classes, I don't think that teachers should.

Stuart Skinner

On the last day of school we work hard all day picking garbage up. Then we go down to the park and have a picnic. After the picnic we used to have a water fight. We did this because the pool wasn't open and we wanted to cool off. I wonder if it will be banned this year also? It's not just a few older kids that want to do it EVERYONE wants to do it.

Shane Philip

The quote was once a prestigious act of stupidity, but now people are abusing "the meaning of quote." In the beginning there was a few select idiots who quoted, but now everybody does it. The original quote, "forking your food" and classics like "string ties" are long gone. Now there are made-up ones and ones that are just plain stupid like, "dehydrated water just add water" that do "the meaning of quote" injustice. There are so many stupid quotes now that there is a quote contest to try and find original quotes. In conclusion I think that people should know that being quoted is not suppose to be an honor but rather a put down. So those of you who quote on purpose should stop trying to act stupid and try acting intelligent.

Stacy Heggen

Recently I read an article in U.S. News about AIDS and who is really at risk. There are millions of normal, every-day life, people wondering if they should make the move to be tested for AIDS. "AIDS, a Time of Testing", the article, says that one out of every four adults surveyed in a poll, worries about getting AIDS. I feel that more people should be considering the fact that they can get this disease because there is more than one way to get it. A blood transfusion is just one of the many ways. The article says that besides the highest risk groups- homosexuals and drug abusers, couples planning to have a baby should both be tested for AIDS. I think that is a really good idea because earlier in the year, I read another article about AIDS and it said that doctors have made several studies and recommend that both members of a couple should definitely be tested. I also think that if a person gets tested and he/she is carrying the AIDS virus but doesn't have AIDS, the carrier should tell his/her spouse. A lot