ABOUT THE INCAS OF PERU.

Wise and Just Civic Administration Discouraged Crime Among the People.

When the Spanish first invaded Peru the government of the Incas was in a flourishing condition there. It is said to have been the most enlightened despotism that ever existed and about the nearest approach to a Utopia that has yet been reached by any people. There was a settled territorial unit of the size of about a dwelling site to an extended area of land for family cultivation for the maintenance of the family. The surplus of produce from this tract went to the immediate needs of the government was given as a tribute to the sovereign and his purposes at the sovereign city of Cuzco. Under the wise and just civic administration crime and public corruption and theft were not known. In Cuzco a resident with 100 bars of silver and gold piled up in his house left it wide open, only placing a small stick across as a sign that the master was out—and nobody went in.

All the tribe was divided into numerous clans. The powers of administration were centered in the elective dignitaries, a military leader and the head of the religious system. There was also a council of chiefs. None of these offices was hereditary and they could not be occupied by sons unless they were specially chosen for the position. The succession of the chief idea did not fall upon the shoulders of his child. This was due to the clan organization, which governed the affairs of state. Inheritance was by mother-right. A man could not marry a woman of his own clan, but had to select one from another. This was the main unit for holding the tribe together.

Woman had no voice in the public affairs of the tribe, but ruled supreme in the home. She was admitted to esoteric societies, of which there were many. Women also practiced healing and became priestesses.

Effects of Right-Eyedness.

The majority of men and women, according to Dr. George M. Gould, are not only right-handed, but right-eyed; that is, the right eye sees better than the left. From this flow some curious results. For instance, right-eyedness explains why, in the development of violin playing, the difficult and rapid fingering was allotted to the less expert left hand, while the easy bowing fell to the dextrous right hand. The reason, as Dr. Gould thinks, is because the ordinary position of the violin is such that the right eye most readily sees the motions and positions of the fingers on the strings. In a similar way the right eye compels the more awkward left hand to direct the gun barrel, while the right has simply to hold the trigger. In chopping, the weaker left arm has to direct and enforce the blow, while the stronger right plays a subordinate part for the convenience of the right eye.—Science.

In Korean Society.

Good society in Korea has many curious customs. One of these is that widows must not remarry. No widow in the really "smart set" would ever dream of remarrying, however young she may be or however soon the death of her husband may have followed her wedding. Married life in Korea is by no means an unmixed blessing to the woman, so perhaps perpetual widowhood might not be objectionable if it were not for the necessity of perpetually wearing mourning for the departed. This means that during the whole of her life she is limited to blue, black and green as colors for her costumes.

Japanese Christians.

Some of the prominent men of Japan are Christians. To this creed belong one member of the imperial cabinet, two judges of the supreme court, two presidents of the lower house of parliament, three vice ministers of state. In the present parliament the president and 13 members in a total membership of 300 are Christians. In the army there are 145 Christian officers, or about three per cent. of all, and the two largest battleships are commanded by Christians. In Tokio three of the daily papers have Christian editors.—Argonaut.
