Rife Gets $41,000 In Condemnation Suit At Butte

A Federal District Court jury Friday returned a verdict of $41,000 in favor of Ike Rife, as compensation for the taking of his 320 acre ranch by the Bureau of Reclamation.

The decision, rendered in Butte, was the latest in a series of verdicts involving Beaverhead county ranches condemned by the Bureau for the Clark Canyon dam.

The Rife ranch is located at the mouth of Horse Prairie Creek at Armstead, and will be entirely flooded by the waters of the reservoir.

The jury returned a quick verdict, after hearing four days of testimony as to land value in Beaverhead county. Bureau of Reclamation appraisers fixed a value on the ranch at a top of $30,000. Independent appraisers testifying for the Justice department valued the ranch as low as $23,623.

Witnesses for Rife appraised the property at $61,000 and $72,000. Testifying for Rife, were Walter Jones, Dillon real estate broker, Evan Huntsman, Armstead rancher and Ivan Shaw, former Beaverhead county rancher and now a Helena appraiser.

Government witnesses included Ed Kempton, Bureau of Reclamation appraiser, Jack Radcliffe, construction engineer for the Bureau, and Howard Sparhawk, a Billings appraiser, hired by the Justice Department.

Rife was represented by Ted McFadden and Frank Davis, Dillon attorneys, and the Government's case was presented by Larry Stimatz and Bob O'Leary, assistant Federal district attorneys.
